Original post by Dolive21The Ethical Slut should prick their ears up, and is a perfectly serious set text on some advanced or specialist jurisprudence courses. More conservatively, and perhaps more conventionally, Justice for Hedgehogs would sound good, but if you're new to jurisprudence is a bit much (not least because it's 450 pages). If you fancy getting a handle on jurisprudence, which is generally where law academics talk about fairness and about law, society, and the interaction of those things, "Jurisprudence: Theory and Context" might interest you. It was a set text for my compulsory LLB introductory jurisprudence module. Be warned that jurisprudence is not one of the seven foundations of legal knowledge, so it is not compulsory on all qualifying law degrees, and potentially could even not be an option at some universities. That is worth checking before you choose courses if you really want to study it, and even if it isn't important to you in the course, you may want to avoid overly focusing on your love of jurisprudence when applying to a university which doesn't cover it.Hi. I am planning to read jurisprudence:theory and context for my personal statement. Would you be willing to talk with me about it, please? Hi all! I was looking for a thread for 2025 law offers for King's but couldn't find one so I decided to make one. Feel free to share any and all offers, rejections, worries, recommendations etc about law applications to Kings (or even other unies if you wish), I personally applied for PPL on the 14th of October but haven't heard back yet, I did hear offers are rolling in for other subjects though. If you could also when talking about the offers mention your stats/the date you applied that would be wonderful but ofc not necessary! Original post by InnateImpunityLarge city firms run formal work experience programmes that are super helpful if you manage to get onto them. Notably, Clifford Chance's ACCESS programme, A&O's Smart Start programme, Ashurt's Access programme, Addleshaw Goddard has one, and there's probably a couple more now because this all existed when I was in year 12 a few years ago.The competition won't be as intense at this level, so as long as you use LinkedIn to network with some of these firm's lawyers (asking what the firm's USP is and which practice area they're working in) then you stand a really good chance of getting through. There are also introductory Forage work experiences you can take part in to better your applications.I was on Clifford Chance's ACCESS programme and A&O's Smart Start so PM me if you would like some extra help with those, but you're right that commercial law can get competitive, and it doesn't hurt to join the pipeline early. I certainly wouldn't have secured as many first year schemes if it weren't for those sixth form programmes.Thank you so much for the advice, i'll PM you! so i'm applying to uni this year and i'm going to be applying to biomedical science. however, i've been reading into law and it seems really interesting and something i want to pursue a career in. but, i've been very indecisive about my career choice so i feel like if i try to change it again, i know everyone's going to tell me i'm indecisive and that i need to stick to just one. i did think of doing medicine but then it seemed too much for me so i considered biomed as it's lab work which is something i really want to do but then i'm also really interested in law. i've considered many other career paths before as well. i hate that i'm indecisive and i know i shouldn't be, especially since degrees aren't cheap which is why i'm trying to make the best decision i can. so i was thinking of doing post-grad law after doing a biomedical science degree. would that be a good idea or not? Original post by etrnalsunshinesis it really as simple as revising negligence, private nuisance, rylands v fletcher , occupiers liability and vicarious liability bc why do i feel like the jump from paper 1 content to paper 2 is so significantly different 🤔🤔Same omggg but the section A there is evaluation for every section so that sort of makes up for it, but think about tort compared to human rights it's so tiny Original post by kzadboy7Hi, so I have ABB in my A levels and wanted to do law, but most places I see are AAA or AAB and I'm just wondering if there are any good RG or other top universities which will accept these grades? I plan on applying for 2022 and currently have 2 B A-levels already, with a predicted grade of an A for the other one.Hi,I felt compelled to answer this question. In short law is very competitive I second that I had similar grades and went to a Uni in London. Worst mistake as there are such competitive and career ready students in law even at that early stage. I highly recommend you look into degrees where you can start a protected title role straight after ie. like pharmacy, nursing, paramedic. If you continue to do law and don't end up doing anything like it its counterproductive and you end up doing more for a regular bachelors degree with like high competition to secure the relevant roles such as trainee solicitor.I know so many people who successfully finished wishing they done something more practical. If you don't even feel like listening to me take a year out work and then decide what it is you want to do. Don't jump into it. Rather than clearing from 3 years ago (can't look at clearing in the last 2 due to CAGs so it's tricky), the most recent indicator (until next week), of spaces is UCAS Extra. I looked at the Unis with space for straight law. I only made a list of the more renowned Unis so there are more, but there were a few RG. While this doesn't indicate they will be in clearing and/or will drop their grade entry, it does tell you that they didn't fill their course through applications, which is quite interesting. Unis with LLB Law course space on UCAS:Birmingham (RG)Bristol (RG)Cardiff (RG)KeeleHullKentLancaster LeicesterLiverpool (RG)Nottingham (RG)Southampton (RG)Agree with previous advice, if you can do a law related EPQ and get an A in it, it can help with dual offers as some Unis offer it, but not many. QMUL only accept it if it's done in year 13, not 12.
